Health Science learns with simulators

The Chipola College Health Science Department is utilizing state-of-the-art technology to teach clinical skills in a safe learning environment.

Nursing, paramedic, and emergency medical technician students are using a family of patient simulators to practice various skills.

A birthing simulator named Noelle can breathe, bleed and talk just like a real mother. The high tech device is designed to help students learn about the challenges associated with delivering babies by making quick decisions in a stressful environment.

Noelle is Chipola's fourth human simulator in the family which includes a child, and male and female adults. Funds for the latest simulator came from the Chipola Regional Workforce Development Board.

All simulators can be adjusted to suit the education point of the student. Medical issues and training can be progressively increased in difficulty as students move through the program. Amy Samson, a Jackson Hospital nurse and Chipola adjunct instructor, is responsible for the patient simulator project. Samson can control the patients' vital signs and speech from a remote location which is equipped with cameras for observing the students.

Chipola Health Science director Vickie Stephens, says, "Simulation in skills labs has become more life-like with the development of moulage, which uses molded plaster to create realistic tissue. The simulation experience affords the students opportunities to integrate critical thinking in the assessment of medical conditions and promotes self-confidence in the nursing process."

Simulation exercises are often videotaped and used by students as a learning tool in de-briefing sessions. When students arrive in the real-life clinical setting, the skills lab training has provided a basic foundation for quality patient care.

An Open House for Alumni of the Chipola Nursing program is planned for mid December. Alumni and members of the Chipola Nursing Advisory Committee will be invited to tour the facility and learn of new opportunities to partner with the nursing program to ensure future generations of success. An alumni link is being added to the Chipola Nursing website, at www.chipola.edu
